

What is this study about?

People living with dementia from minority ethnic groups and their carers often have different experiences at the later stages of the disease.

This study is looking at the experiences of different ethnic groups, including what better care at the later stages of dementia would look like, what helps or prevents this, and how health and social care services can support this.

Who We Are

This research project is led by Narin Aker, a PhD student at University College London (UCL).

HEALTHCARE AT THE LATER STAGES OF DEMENTIA

Perspectives from people of minority ethnic groups

What does it involve?

If you decide to take part, you will be interviewed by a researcher about your thoughts on care at the later stages of dementia. This could be the care you would like to receive in the future as a person with dementia, or the experiences you have had as someone who is, or was, caring for someone with dementia at the later stages.

The interview will last for around one hour. You will receive a £10 gift voucher as a thank you for your time.

Who are we looking for?

We would like to hear from people living with dementia and carers of people living with dementia (including previous carers), who identify as:

- Black African
- Black Caribbean
- Indian
- Pakistani
- Bangladeshi

What happens next?

If you are interested in the study, or want to know more, please get in touch with the researcher (contact details are on the back of this leaflet).

If you have been sent this leaflet by your GP surgery, you can also fill in the reply slip enclosed and return it to the researcher using the envelope provided.

The researcher will get in touch with you to give you more information about the study, and let you know what the next steps will be.
